This lecture explores the role of craftsmen and workshops in giving shape to Christianity in the fourth and later centuries CE. Arts carried a certain magic, or efficacy, in protecting places and directing supernatural powers. After reviewing the various dimensions of this efficacy, textile weavers and mortuary specialists are looked at as particular areas for the integration of Christianity in Egypt.